Dealing with ecological disaster

Environmentalists say full fallout from spill that leaked 144,000 gallons of oil into the waters off Huntington Beach may not be known for some time.

Even as rescue workers rush to dab oil from the wings of compromised birds and execute carefully planned strategies for transporting species to and from care centers, environmentalists countywide are bracing for the full impact of an ecological disaster.

Local wildlife experts are reporting the initial tolls of an oil spill that broke out over the weekend near an offshore oil processing facility several miles at sea and began a slow but inevitable creep toward south Orange County coastlines, home to numerous protected areas and sensitive marshlands.

Following news of the spill Saturday, Huntington Beach city officials immediately moved to place floating containment booms to stop the encroachment of the spreading slick into delicate lands around Talbert Marsh and Bosa Chica Ecological Reserve.

Cleanup crews have been busy at work in Newport and Laguna beaches, which absorbed the initial impact of the southward moving slick earlier this week.

By Monday, oil had infiltrated the Talbert, Brookhurst and Magnolia marshes, while initial efforts to keep Bolsa Chica intact seemed to have worked, said John Villa, executive director of the Huntington Beach Wetlands Conservancy.

"We're pretty lucky, as far as how far the oil spill has gone west," he said in a news conference. "It's only gone just past the pier, and not very far. Bolsa Chica at least is protected from any oil getting there at this point. They have boomed off the inlet, so hopefully it will catch anything

Hopes of O.C. businesses, locals and tourists dashed by oil spill closures

BY SARA CARDINE, LILLY NGUYEN, MATT SZABO, ANDREW TURNER

Orange County coastal communities — where tourism thrives and where more than a million people crowded Saturday to catch the Pacific Airshow — have become relative ghost towns after a massive oil spill caused beach closures and fishing bans with no end in sight.

In the days since 144,000 gallons of oil spilled from a ruptured pipeline near an offshore oil processing facility in federal waters, city officials in Huntington Beach and Laguna Beach have closed their coastlines to the public, while Newport Beach has banned swimming, surfing and all waterrelated activities off its shores.

Meanwhile, a widescale suspension of all fishing activity, from Warner Avenue in Huntington Beach southward to Crown Valley in Dana Point and extending six miles out to sea was set in place Saturday following a declaration from California Fish and Wildlife officials.

No timeline for reopening has been given, which spells bad news for local enterprises whose stock and trade comes from ocean and the tourism it attracts.

crisis along the Orange County coastline, after an offshore pipeline leak over the weekend spilled 144,000 gallons of oil into the waters off Huntington Beach.

The incident occurred roughly 4.5 miles off the coast at a deep-sea oil processing facility located in federal waters, where a segment of a 17.5-mile pipeline running from the Port of Long Beach to an offshore oil platform was breached.

The U.S. Coast Guard is investigating whether a large commercial ship set anchor in the wrong location, compromising the pipeline. Exactly when the event took place is still being determined.

Even as those details remain under investigation, legislators are taking swift action. The Huntington Beach City Council in a special meeting Monday adopted a resolution declaring a local emergency for a period of at least 30 days. Council members Eric Peterson and Mike Posey were absent.

City Manager Oliver Chi provided council members a rough timeline of events and an update on the massive cleanup efforts happening in and around the city's coastline.

He said although residents in Huntington and Newport beaches reported smelling a persistent odor of gas on Friday night, the U.S. Coast Guard didn't inform city officials until Saturday a possible breach may have taken place.

Although the oil was not expected to reach the shoreline until Monday, Chi said a police helicopter reconnaissance mission Saturday evening revealed a 5.8-nautical-mile stretch of oil about seven miles off the coast stretching from Newland Street in Huntington Beach south to the Balboa Pier.

"At that point, things were starting to feel much more serious," he said.

The city proactively began employing protection efforts that have continued into this week, including a total closure of beaches along the city's coastline.

Some 14 oil-skimming boats have been deployed, including four to six vessels actively working to remove oil from the

New swim fin company launches in Newport

BY MATT SZABO

Ted Li lives steps from sands of Newport the Beach.

And with a combined 22 years worked at Oakley and Ouiksilver (now Boardriders), he's certainly familiar with the beach lifestyle.

"I've raised three boys in Newport, we live at the beach, they've all been Jun-ior Guards," Li said. "We all love the water. Is there something that we can do in that space?"

Li's answer launched Friday when his new bodysurfing fin company, the Single Co., went live. He is partnered with former Corona del Mar High football quarterback Cayman Carter, who still lives in Newport Beach, on the product, which also has an Instagram.

Single fins, which cost $95 for a pair, are now available.

"I think we checked all the boxes, from a comfort level, from the design, aesthetics," Li said. "I think we're pretty happy with where we're at.

"When you talk to someone who uses a bodysurfing fin, they always complain about it. 'I get blisters on my pinky toe, I get cut on the top of my foot.' The fins today basically cut up your feet. There's a lack of emphasis on comfort and performance.'

Li said the team has crafted Single fins more like a running shoe, providing a snug and secure fit. Made of silicon, they are also built to resist wear and cracking.

He said the partnership with Carter came partly due to a friendship with Carter's father, Berry.

"This is not about, we want to be a $20-million business," Li said. "We want to make amazing products, and we want to deliver an amazing experience to our customers. We just want to have fun."

Cayman Carter, the 2012 Newport-Mesa Dream Team Football Player of the Year, is also happy with the product. He played football at Southern Methodist University for a couple of years, before graduating and getting right into business.

He also keeps busy with his wife and 1-year-old daughter Charlotte, with a baby boy due in March.

"As soon as football was over, I needed something to push and stimulate me, and that was business," Carter said. "I found that same kind of competitiveness that I had in football in

"I think it's about time we get rid of offshore oil drilling," he said. "The [cost-to-benefit ratio] is clearly not worth it. We see something like this happen every five to 10 years – it's horrific for our beaches, our environment and our marine ecosystems, and it has to stop.'

Huntington Beach Mayor Kim Carr, who's been at the forefront of the disaster since news began to break over the weekend, on Monday recognized the proactive efforts of city staff and public safety officials to protect the city's waters and wetlands.

She said the support from the community in the wake of the oil spill has been overwhelming.

"It's times like these when I'm so grateful to be a resident of Huntington Beach. I'm so grateful to serve this community as the mayor — I've never been more proud of this city," she said.

"Our city really made the hard choices to go out and do all of these protective measures before we were even told that it was actually going to hit," she continued. "We're all in this together."

ocean before it hit shorelines at southern locations in Laguna Beach and Dana Point. As of Tuesday, 4,158 gallons of oil had been successfully recovered.

At a mobile incident command post that has been installed at Huntington State Beach, 320 people on the ground have been coordinating cleanup and strategically positioning a collective 8,700 feet — nearly 1.65 miles of temporary floating containment booms to check the spill.

In Newport Beach, Mayor Brad Avery said officials met with the city's emergency operations center team Sunday and described local efforts as "up to the moment." Although city staff are coordinating with state and county agencies, fewer reports of oil washing ashore have been received. Avery attributed this, in part, to the shape of Newport's coast.

'There's a knuckle right at Newport Pier. [So], there has been oil that's come on shore, but not a lot," he said. "They've had a couple of small blobs come ... but it's getting dispersed over time and the main slick is offshore and is headed in the direction of Dana Point. If there's no more spilling going on, we may get very lucky here."

As a precautionary measure, Newport Harbor was closed Monday to vessel traffic to prevent the encroachment of oil. Avery said the city remains vigilant, despite observing very little boat activity in the area. While the sands remain open for recreational use, swimming, surfing and other water sports are prohibited and could be for months.

Coastal currents by Monday had carried the miles-long oil slick southward toward Laguna Beach, where small oil clusters had washed up on shore on Crescent Bay and Shaw's Cove. City officials closed beaches to the public on Sunday, while two contracted oil recovery vessels worked to prevent the spill from moving onshore.

In a citywide release issued Monday, Laguna Beach Mayor Bob Whalen said every effort was being made to protect residents' safety and prevent ecological harm to the city's Marine Protected Area.

"We have been working nonstop since early Sunday with state and federal officials to ensure that the city receives the resources that we need to protect our beaches," Whalen "We commit to do said.

whatever it takes to make sure that our beaches and tidepools are returned to the pristine quality that Laguna's residents and visitors expect and enjoy."

COUNTY, STATE RESPONSE

Government officials at the county and state levels have been working to assist municipalities in relief efforts and to advocate for legislation that could help prevent future catastrophic disasters.

Orange County The Board of Supervisors on Tuesday unanimously adopted a countywide resolution declaring a local emergency in the days following the spill. In a post to Twitter immediately following the regular meeting, District 2 Supervisor Katrina Foley announced the move.

"This will ensure that available county resources are available to respond to and recover from this oil spill," Foley wrote. "I look forward to working collaboratively with the county, alongside our state, federal and local partners to mitigate the damage that this oil spill has on our environment and communities."

Upon hearing news that, despite containment efforts, the slick was continuing to spread southward from Huntington environment."

Meanwhile, state and federal elected officials who represent Orange County communities working to pass legislation to end offshore drilling in California say the recent disaster only highlights why such practices should end.

State Sen. Dave Min (D-Irvine), speaking in a public comment at Monday's Huntington Beach Council meeting, said he and fellow legislators, Cottie Petrie-Norris (D-Laguna Beach) and state Sen. Tom Umberg (D-Orange), were interested in pursuing a possible moratorium on new offshore drilling in federal waters, similar to a

"Federal, state and local officials have been working around the clock to protect residents, the shoreline and wildlife," she wrote. "It is imperative that the federal government assist in recovery efforts."

Hours before the supervisors meeting late Monday, Gov. Gavin Newsom declared a state of emergency in Orange County to help with the clean-up efforts, the Los Angeles Times reported.

from coming in.

"That's a critical balance we have to play with that," he said. "Give it a week or two, the fish start dying off and the plants start dying off, because they need oxygen in the water."

Anticipating ecological impacts immediately following the spill, representatives from California Fish & Wildlife and the Oiled Wildlife Care Network, in a joint news conference Monday at Huntington Beach's Wetlands and Wildlife Care Center, updated the public on the procedure for transporting and treating animals impacted by the spill.

OWCN Director Michael Ziccardi said his team is searching on water and on land for oiled animals. As of Tuesday, a total of nine live oiled birds have been taken in, including a brown pelican that had to be euthanized Sunday due to chronic injuries.

Ziccardi said Monday he was "cautiously optimistic" about the relatively low number of impacted animals that had so far been collected.

"When we heard of the large size of the slick, we had great concerns," Ziccardi said. "In our initial assessment of the area, the number of birds in the general area seems to be lower than we had feared."

The Oiled Wildlife Care Network is made up of 44 different organizations throughout the state, which respond collectively to animals in crisis during oil spills. The group has responded to more than 75 oil spills in the state since 1994, Ziccardi said, and cared for 10,000 animals that have been oiled in those spills.

Ziccardi said field teams were deployed immediately at first light Sunday, to start to cover beaches from Bolsa Chica to Newport Beach to look for oiled animals. Four facilities were placed on standby, including the center in Huntington Beach and the Pacific Marine Mammal Center in Laguna Beach.

CRUDE OIL covers the sand as a bulldozer creates a berm at the mouth of the Santa Ana River in Newport Beach on Sunday. An offshore pipe line burst the day before, leaking oil which washed up all along local shorelines.

Center, said the normal body temperature of a bird on average is about 104 degrees.

"If there's any break in the feathers — the oil gets on the feather, the feather parts, the water gets down to their skin — that water is about 60, 65 [degrees]," she said. "You can see they get cold in a hurry. They come in hypothermic."

McGuire said she is not asking people to bring in donations to the center.

"You can see all the traffic that happens, and we need to have it open for the trucks and boats that are coming in and out," Mc-Guire said. "If they go to our webpage, they can help there. Not that we need money for the oil spill, but we need money just to keep operating."

To help broker the donation of needed goods to organizations leading the rescue efforts, Laguna Beach nonprofit Pacific Marine Mammal Center is accepting items from nearby residents.

Krysta Higuchi, spokeswoman for the nonprofit Pacific Marine Mammal Center, said the facility has received copious donations in anticipation of an inevitable influx of new patients. While no new marine mammals had been brought to the center since the oil spill as of Tuesday, Higuchi said the true fallout of the disaster will not be known for some time.

"The impact to these marine mammals can last short term and long term," she added. "There can be forever changes to our environment and ecosystem in areas, so we don't fully know the magnitude of this spill quite yet."

In the environmentally conscious enclave of Laguna Beach, community support has been overwhelming in the immediate aftermath of the oil spill, Higuchi said.

As if on cue, Cherie Polo of Dana Point stopped by Tuesday to donate several bottles of soap and trash bags, two items on PMMC's wish list. She described the awfulness of watching the weekend's events unfold.

"I think it's awful," said Polo, an avid whale watcher. "And it's not just this oil spill — there's trash in our ocean. It's us humans that are destroying our beautiful planet. We all, as humans, can be more responsible."

OIL collects on the sand at the mouth of the Santa Ana River in Newport Beach on Sunday.

Higuchi said the center has been collecting donated items on site, in part, to prevent well-intentioned citizens from disrupting cleanup efforts and for their own health.

"We definitely do not want [items] dropped off at the front line," she said. "It's all hands on deck, and it's a dangerous area out there with all the toxins and chemicals."

TEAMS OF CLEAN-UP CREWS FAN OUT

In Newport Beach Tuesday, cleanup crews wearing in boots lined with yellow plastic patrolled the shore-

it's going to take for us to see that there may be different ways to do things other than drilling off the shore," working on another drawing in the sunlight on the boardwalk, where a street performer also played the lished Incident Command Post. Two oil recovery vessels have been working since Monday to keep more oil from coming ashore.

Laguna Beach is a Marine Protected area, so it is critical we get resources in here to help with cleanup efforts," Snow said.

Orange County Supervisor Katrina Foley, whose Second District includes Huntington Beach and Newport Beach, took a helicopter tour of the coastline earlier this week with the Orange County Sheriff's Department and Rep. Mike Levin (D-San Juan Capistrano).

Foley said there didn't appear to be as much encroachment into the shoreline as had been previously seen. Newport Beach and Dana Point harbors are both closed, though Foley mentioned that people can use the Huntington Beach and Long Beach harbors for their boating needs.

"It's traveling south into other areas," she said. "They're looking at how much further south it's going to get, seemingly maybe even to the Mexican border. We are still going to keep monitoring it."

Foley said there remains no timeline for when the beaches, now closed throughout Orange County, will reopen and cleanup will be done.

"I felt positive about the fact that the oil is not rushing toward the shore. You didn't see big clumps of oil near the shore. It was mostly big ribbons and threads that looked like they were almost two miles out ... moving not toward the shore, but parallel or away," she said. "As the ocean moves, so goes the oil."

California Department of Fish & Wildlife has set up an Oiled Wildlife Care Network hotline at (877) 823-6926 for individuals who may see wildlife impacted by the spill.

Individuals interested in future cleanup efforts are encouraged to visit the Wetlands Wildlife Care Center at wwccoc.org or the Surfrider Foundation at cleanups.surfrider.org.

Dave Wiggins, an employee of the Huntington Pier's Let's Go Fishing, said Tuesday business has decreased by about two-thirds at the shop, which rents fishing equipment and sells bait, tackle and beach supplies.

It has been a double whammy over the last week for the store, which had to close during this weekend's Pacific Airshow because it was in the flight path of the jets, Wiggins said. Many of the shot glasses on a shelf behind the cashier, typically sold for $8 apiece, fell off from the jets' rumbling and were broken.

Let's Go Fishing opened Sunday as the final day of the airshow was canceled, but foot traffic is scant.

"It's shut us down quite a bit," Wiggins said. "There's not many people on the beach, so there's not many people in the stores."

HUNTINGTON BEACH'S MAIN STREET MUTED

On Main Street in Huntington Beach, traffic was similarly light as workers prepared for the weekly Surf City Nights street fair on Tuesday.

Will Walton, general manager and operating partner at Killarney's Irish Pub, is also concerned about how long the beaches may stay closed.

"Obviously, the oil spill is a little setback," Walton said. "When people read the news, they automatically assume that all of downtown is closed because the beaches are closed. It doesn't really make you want to come out here."

Walton said Killarney's was hoping to ride the wave of big events on back-toback weekends — the U.S. Open of Surfing and the airshow — into a successful fall.

"It would have helped us to have a lot more steam going into Halloween and then Thanksgiving," he said. "But with the shutdown of the beaches ... how do we staff? Are there going to be people down here? What does the midweek look like? It could be scary."

TOUR BUSINESSES SUFFER FROM LACK OF TRAFFIC

Balboa Village in Newport Beach on Tuesday afternoon was also quieter than usual. Nearby waters were placid as boats remained silent in their moorings.

A kiosk where visitors line up to attend whalewatching tours was shuttered, while a nearby boat rental business and the tiny storefront of a parasailing company were likewise closed and unattended.

Jessica Roame, education manager for Newport Landings and Davey's Locker sportfishing and whale watching, said this has been the picture of Balboa Village for the last few days. The agency has had to cancel nearly all tours since Sunday.

"We didn't really see a huge impact until Sunday ... when we noticed there was quite a bit of oil in the area," said Roame.

"The economic impact of our business being closed for several days is already pretty tough on us given the post-pandemic slowdown," she continued. "[And] we don't know how long this is going to go on for."

Caitlin Aston, assistant manager and dockhand at Boat Rentals of America, said they haven't seen much impact to their business, likely because the boat rentals are kept inside of Newport Harbor, closed Monday to vessel traffic.

RESIDENTS, TOURISTS LEFT HIGH AND DRY

Among the few beachgoers who ventured out into south county areas impacted by the oil spill this week, many expressed concerns for the impact of the oil spill on maritime activities as well as local marine life.

Visible effects of the disaster were not too apparent on Corona del Mar Beach, much to the relief of local resident Ray Gorman, who on Monday was out walking his dog, Stella.

Gorman first heard about the oil spill Saturday, while watching the Pacific Airshow. A friend passed along the notification via a cellphone screenshot. He recalled the air smelled a little like gas on Sunday but didn't notice anything else out of the ordinary.

A daily beachgoer, Gorman said it was surprising to learn of the oil spill after such a busy weekend in Huntington Beach.

"Hopefully, [it's] a wakeup call. I don't know what said Gorman. "You had the ocean literally on fire earlier this year and now you have this. I don't think these things are repairable, and that's a hard pill to swallow."

Newport Beach resident Pam Darveaux said she too was at the Pacific Airshow on Saturday when she heard the news. Although she recalled a friend of hers commenting on the smell of oil in the air on Friday, she thought it was likely from the jets flying overhead.

"When we got back, we got home around 3 p.m. and then I looked at my phone and saw that there was an oil slick, right off the coast where we had been. It's horrible," said Darveaux. "I hope they're taking measures to keep it from being as bad as it might be, but I know we're going to have repercussions from this."

Ariel Tweto, who was out for a run on the boardwalk in Laguna Beach, commented on the absence of people on the sand after the city closed its beaches late Sunday evening in anticipation of the oil spill making landfall.

"It's just eerie, especially yesterday, like the first morning [after the beach closures]," Tweto said. "It was like a ghost town. I was out running around here, and there was no one."

Clear skies followed a rare Southern California thunderstorm that rolled through on Monday. Some businesses propped up their floodgates for the downpour, but it appeared to be largely business as usual for the Promenade on Forest in downtown Laguna Beach on Tuesday.

Some were undeterred by the beach closures, as a woman was seen tanning in beachwear on the lawn adjacent to Main Beach. An artist showcased several pieces of his work while cello for passersby.

Jessica Williams, in town visiting from Virginia, was waiting with her kids to hop on a Laguna Beach trolley after finding the access stairway to Shaw's Cove closed off by caution tape.

"We're coming out for a family wedding, and we're staying just up the street," Williams said. "We were hoping to enjoy the beach."

As men in hazardous materials vests combed the beach for debris, Huntington Beach residents Garrett Blackwell, 24, and Nick Roberts, 26, played a game of catch near the water on the north side of the pier. That was quickly derailed, however, as a lifeguard in a truck came by and asked them to move back, telling them there could be oil particles in the sand.

Roberts, who lives nearby off of First Street, didn't mind.

Roberts said his grandfather was sailing his sailboat on Saturday, watching what ended up being the last day of the Pacific Airshow, but he got oil all over his anchor.

"I'm leaning toward getting these [rigs] out of here and not letting them drill anymore," he said.

Ryan Fagan, of Chandler, Ariz., brought his three boys to the beach on Tuesday. But they only stayed for about an hour, a fraction of the parking time that Fagan had purchased.

"It kind of sucks without the water," Fagan said. "Today's a beautiful day, too. I was looking forward to it. I hope they can clean [the oil] up and it doesn't change anything. I hope the wildlife doesn't suffer too bad."

H.B. girls take second at Central Park Invitational

Without the platform of invitationals last season, the improvement of the Huntington Beach High School girls' cross-country team may have flown under the radar.

The Oilers took the strength in numbers approach, emphasizing the pack racing style while competing in a spring season that consisted of against dual meets schools in their district to minimize crowds during the COVID-19 pandemic.

A new reinforcement has now given the Oilers an ace at the front.

Sophomore Makenzie McRae posted a winning time of 17 minutes 38.5 seconds in her season debut on Saturday, leading a strong showing for Huntington Beach in the Central Park Invitational.

McRae, who returned to Southern California after spending the previous school year in Oregon, was one of two girls to finish with a time of under 18 minutes in the Section 1 girls' varsity race, which featured the larger schools at the meet.

"I lived in Bend, Oregon, which is like central Oregon," McRae said. "I just think the altitude and being up there for a year definitely helped my running, especially now that it is like no altitude over here."

Huntington Beach finished second to Redondo Union, which won the team battle by a count of 75-95. Quinn Roldan (fourth, 18:19.2) and Lewis (fifth, Claire 18:19.7) also placed well for the Oilers, and Luna Centeno (42nd, 20:04.0) and Belle Baker (20:20.5) rounded out the scoring five.

Oilers coach Kareen

Shackelford credited the work of the program's seniors for creating a culture of hard work for the incoming runners to follow. She said the coaching staff lets the athletes set their own goals.

"It's not we coaches," Shack the Shackelford said. "We ask them what their goals were, and they have big dreams."

Corona del Mar sophomore Melisse Djomby-Envawe delivered a lifetime-best performance in taking third place in 18:08.1, knocking 22 seconds off her personal record established at the Woodbridge Classic two weeks prior.

Emma Scheumann (16th, 19:04.0) paced Newport Harbor, and Leah Ferris (19th, 19:12.9) led Fountain Valley.

Esteban Prado, who was a standout runner for the Barons in his prep days, won the open division race of the meet prior to the high school competition. He crossed the finish line in 15:13.6, holding onto bragging rights over his brother for now.
