Be Well Huntington Beach set to launch next month

The mobile crisis response team will respond to mental health and personal assistance calls.

BY MATT SZABO

A 12-year-old boy is acting unruly, and his agitated mother is trying to get him under control. Traditionally the Huntington Beach Police Department has responded to calls like these, even though the situation does not present an immediate threat of danger. But a new option is coming to Surf City starting Aug. 2.

Huntington Beach is partnering with Be Well Orange County to launch a new mobile crisis response team, Be Well Huntington Beach, to manage such situations. A big blue Be Well van will be driving around the city, carrying an emergency medical technician and a clinically trained

Police investigating death of Long Beach woman in Fountain Valley as a homicide

BY ANDREW TURNER

Fountain Valley police are investigating the death of a Long Beach woman in the city earlier this week as a homicide. Officers responded to a call reporting a traffic collision in a residential neighborhood near the intersection of Slater Avenue and Tradewinds Street on Monday at 6:11 p.m., authorities said. Upon their arrival, officers found Fountain Valley Fire Department personnel and residents attempting to provide medical aid to the driver of a vehicle that had come to a stop along the curb on the south side of Amberwood Circle and adjacent to the west curb of Tradewinds Street. A gunshot wound to the driver, a 26-year-old woman, was discovered, authorities said in a news release. She was pronounced dead at the scene. Her name was withheld, pending notification of her family members. Sgt. Donald Farmer, a spokesman for the Fountain Valley Police Department, said there was not a second vehicle involved in the incident. “We restricted access at Slater and treated that as the crime scene south of there,” Farmer said.

Reward for information on injured pelicans climbs to $25,500

BY LILLY NGUYEN

Two more brown pelicans have been reported as dead on Orange County’s coast, prompting the Animal Legal Defense Fund to add to the reward for information on the perpetrators by $20,000. This also brings the total number of injured pelicans discovered with broken wings between San Clemente and Huntington Beach to 34 since October. The organization said that most pelicans did not survive their injuries and those that did required emergency surgery and long-term care. At least 22 of the pelicans died of their injuries, the Wetlands and Wildlife Care Center reported last month. The birds were classified as a federally endangered species in 1970, but were removed from the list in 2009. “This infusion of funds added to our initial reward reflects the severity of harm to the pelicans found mutilated in Orange County and mounting pressure to find answers,” Animal Legal Defense Fund executive director Stephen Wells said in a statement. “We are hopeful that the local community will come forward with information in order to prevent further harm to these animals.” The state is currently investigating the more than 100 miles of coast between Orange and Ventura counties, but Capt. Patrick Foy of Fish and Wildlife’s law enforcement division said state officials are at their wit’s end with the ongoing investigation.

Forum tackles ethnic studies issue

The Orange County Board of Education plans two similar panel discussions on Tuesday and Aug. 24.

BY SARA CARDINE

As critical race theory — the examination of institutions through a lens of racism and inequality — becomes a nationwide political flashpoint, ongoing efforts by schools to promote inclusivity, in part, by offering ethnic studies courses have come under fire. Now, county education officials are attempting to separate fact from fiction by hosting discussions to update the public on what is and isn’t being taught in local classrooms.

In a virtual colloquium Wednesday hosted by the Orange County Department of Education, scholars and educators shed light on the origins of a recently approved statewide model curriculum for teaching ethnic studies in public schools. The event preceded two similar panel discussions on ethnic studies and critical race theory being hosted by the Orange County Board of Education, which sets policies for OCDE, on Tuesday and Aug. 24.

“With Liberty and Justice for All” convened experts, university researchers and superintendents from four school districts, who shared the potential values and benefits of such coursework on students of all backgrounds. Supt. Al Mijares, who moderated the discussion, explained the county office received several requests from local school district officials for the department to provide an overview of the state model curriculum and clear up misconceptions about critical race theory being taught to students. “To be clear, ethnic studies is not synonymous with critical race theory,” he said. “But we also can-

FIELD MANAGER Robert Mooney shares pieces of n invasive algae species, Caulerpa prolifera, that was filtered through a filtration system set up at China Cove Beach in Newport Beach earlier this month.

Cleaning of Newport Harbor of invasive algae species may be complete, but diver surveys will continue

BY LILLY NGUYEN

Vacuum dredging of an invasive algae species out from Newport Harbor was completed earlier this month, but city officials extended a local emergency declaration on the issue to allow for federal and state officials to complete the final stages of its removal.

Divers will soon be conducting surveys in and around Newport Harbor over the next few weeks to check for any other signs of Caulerpa prolifera, a species of algae that is not harmful to humans but could have damaging effects on Newport Harbor's ecosystem.

A team of divers, setting out from China Cove, completed removal of the algae by way of vacuum pumps on July 12.

The algae collected was brought onshore, where it and other solids were filtered out from the ocean water. The filtered water was then discharged.

Divers continued to pick up stray pieces and performed final sweeps.

City officials said a local emergency declaration was necessary to secure funding for the aquatic plant's removal. The work is funded by the California State Water Resources Control Board.

The extension made last week will continue the emergency declaration by another 60 days, which is expected to allow state and federal officials time to complete the surveys of Newport Harbor.

Those surveys are funded by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service and National Marine Fisheries Service.

Signs of the algae were discovered in March by a diver and it was positively identified as Caulerpa prolifera by the Orange County Department of Agriculture. State officials were notified in April.

The species is closely related to Caulerpa taxifolia, which was discovered in Huntington Beach in the early 2000s and was eradicated by 2006.

The species is native to Florida and other subtropical and tropical areas. City staff said this is the first time that the species has been positively identified on the West Coast.

It is capable of colonizing by fragmentation, meaning that parts of the plant that may break off can become viable plants elsewhere.

It is not clear how the Caulerpa prolifera entered Newport Harbor.

not omit structural injustices from our history."

While state lawmakers consider legislation that would make such courses a high school graduation requirement, many Orange County districts — including Anaheim, Santa Ana and Los Alamitos unified school districts — are already teaching or creating classes, mainly as electives.

Courses include texts from a diversity of authors, cover the contributions made by people of color in government, science and the arts and create a space for students to share their own cultural touchpoints, questions and concerns.

"We are at a critical juncture in this county in terms of trust — trust in things like law enforcement, trust in government, trust in religious institutions...and trust in our public schools," said Michael Matsuda, superintendent of Anaheim Unified, where officials in May made ethnic studies a required course.

"Ethnic studies builds trust in schools, in affirming identity. And that trust begins with connecting to oneself and to others."

Administrators shared how their districts are creating coursework to respond to demands from students and families to see history and institutions from more than just one perspective.

Gregory Franklin is the superintendent of Tustin Unified, where an ethnic studies elective will be offered in the fall. He refuted the claims of critics who've raised concerns that such teachings would separate races into oppressors and victims and potentially shame white students.

"There are a lot of people who haven't been good actors in history," he said. "Nobody should be feeling guilty about that in class, but if we're not honest about where we've been, it's going to be very difficult for us to go forward together."

Early research indicates participation in such coursework has the potential to improve academic behaviors and outcomes among at-risk students.

A 2016 study co-authored by UC Irvine education policy researcher Emily K. Penner found students who elected to take ethnic studies courses increased school attendance by 21% and improved their GPAs by an average of 1.4 points compared to a control group.

Kimberly Young, who teaches ethnic studies classes at Culver City Unified School District and serves on the state's Quality Instruction Commission, said such classes can be powerful places for students to think critically, learn and grow.

"My classroom is not a space of indoctrination. It is a place where students are free to ask and explore questions they have about histories that have been excluded from our traditional curriculum," she said. "Ethnic studies empowers all students to engage socially and politically and think about the world around them."

"We have followed up on a couple of small tips that really didn't turn up much substantive evidence," Foy said. "We're hoping for anything new that might help us give us more data or evidence to suggest that [the injuries are] in fact human-caused or any other situation where these birds are being injured somehow."

"The birds have been found anywhere between Dana Point to Ventura at various stages of injury," Foy said.

"But they have had nobody seeing someone try to catch these birds or intentionally mutilate them and release them into the wild,"

he added. "We're trying to put the pieces together to determine just how in fact this is happening and nobody is seeing it."

Officials are encouraging members of the public to call the state tip line at (888) 334-2258 if they have any information.

counselor to respond to calls that are mental health- or behavior-related.

Police have been training the Be Well OC civilians this week, prior to the launch of the program.

On Wednesday at the Go-thard Fire Training Center, HBPD officers Jerry Thom-as and Frank Gallant walked four Be Well team members through various situations, including arriv-ing at the home of an agi-tated person. They also talked about how to handle and respond to 911 dis-patchers.

Be Well Huntington Beach will have radios out in the field, HBPD spokes-woman Jennifer Carey said, and the team can request police or fire assistance, de-pending on the nature of the situation.

“The introduction of Be Well into Huntington Beach really supports us in two different ways,” Carey said. “One, it allows us to send crisis counselors who are better equipped to handle mental health issues than a police officer to incidents of mental health crisis, in or-der to support our resi-dents. A lot of times, when a police officer responds, it has the potential of escalating a situation even more.

“Not only does it serve our residents better, it also assists the police depart-ment in allowing our offi-cers to respond to actual police incidents, incidents of crime throughout the city, in a more effective manner. By introducing this program, we’re allowing our cops to do cop work.”

Be Well OC has been gaining momentum, as it opened a mental health and wellness campus in Orange in January. The first year of the pilot program in Huntington Beach is funded by a $1.5-million contract.

Tony Delgado, director of the Be Well OC mobile cri-sis response team, said the group plans to begin its work in Garden Grove soon, but Huntington Beach is the first Orange County city to adopt such a program.

It is based on the Crisis Assistance Helping Out On The Streets (CAHOOTS) program that has been suc-cessful in Eugene, Ore., Del-gado said.

The Huntington Beach City Council unanimously approved the program in April.

According to a staff re-port prepared by interim Police Chief Julian Harvey, HBPD responds to more than 2,500 calls annually on mental health-related needs, and another 12,000 relating to homelessness. Combined, they represent about 10% of all calls for service.

“Officers are expected to respond to so many calls that are really not policing calls,” Delgado said.

“They’re human service calls ... and we work as a team. You know, when somebody calls dispatch, dispatch assesses the call and employs the appropri-ate agency, whether it's po-lice, fire or ambulance. For many calls, police is the only response they have. Now, they’re going to have another button that they can push, which is our team.”

Carey said police officers are expected to ride around with the Be Well Hunting-ton Beach team until mid-

August, until they can get fully up to speed.

The team can also take homeless people to receive services at the Huntington Beach Navigation Center, which opened last fall.

“It’s not necessarily a homeless program, but it’s going to be of assistance for homeless [people],” Carey said.

“I started thinking, ‘This is a good idea,’ [because] you start humanizing the situations in which they’re actually going to respond to ... Be Well will not only as-sess the situation, but they actually do follow-ups as well.”
